A LOOK INTO LIQUEURS

The diverse segment encompasses creamy, dessert-like sips, fruity cordials, and sweet, flavored-whiskey expressions, as well as bitter aperitifs.

They may not generate the excitement of fast-growing spirit categories such as American whiskey and tequila, but cordials and liqueurs remain an integral component in classic cocktails and modern mixology. The diverse segment encompasses creamy, dessert-like sips, fruity cordials, and sweet, flavored-whiskey expressions, as well as bitter aperitifs.

With the exception of 2016, the category has stayed in growth mode these past nine years, with an average annual increase of 3 percent. The top six cordials and liqueurs suppliers represented 67.3 percent of U.S. volume. The top three—Sazerac Co., Beam Suntory, and Diageo—held a 50 percent share of the category as each company slightly expanded their share. The leading domestic brands tend to be whiskey-based liqueurs and fruit cordials, while several top imported liqueurs lean toward more decadent, cream beverages.

Many brands have expanded their lines to bring in new customers and extend seasonality. A number of brands have also recently refreshed their packaging, including Pama Pomegranate liqueur and passion fruit liqueur Passoã.

The return of classic cocktails has given new life to several longtime liqueur brands. Campari, which saw stagnant consumption in the United States for decades, has been growing thanks in large part to the Negroni.

Mixologists have put their own creative spins on the cocktail. But it's the consumer interest in aperitivo culture and spritz drinks that has really boosted sales of bitter liqueurs, namely Aperol.

Charity Johnston, the Los Angeles-based director of operations at The Madera Group, [has noticed] consumer interest in making dining and drinking a full experiential occasion—whether in a restaurant or at home. People are drinking more “European-style” now, she says, giving more consideration to the entire experience of what they’re drinking before and after the meal. That could be a good sign for the cordials and liqueurs category.

LIQUEURS—PERFECT BEFORE AND AFTER DINNER

Promote a variety of liqueurs your customers can enjoy in appetizing, cleanse-the-palate cocktails before dinner as well as in luscious, decadent after-dinner dessert cocktails.

For pre-dinner drinks, suggest they choose “dry/less sweet/bitter” liqueurs (including Aperol, Campari, and floral, licorice, herbal, and other “bitters”) to sip as is or to mix with orange, pineapple, grapefruit, or other juice and/or with tonic water, sparkling water, or sparkling wine.

For after-dinner drinks, suggest they choose “sweet/creamy” liqueurs (including liqueurs flavored with chocolate, honey, fruits, and nuts) to sip as is, stir into coffee, or use to make favorite dessert cocktails.

7 WHISK(E)Y TRENDS IN 2020

The craft movement has brought rising levels of distilling expertise, knowledge, and innovation.

As brands continue to innovate, look for more distillers to flex their creative muscles in employing oak.

BY KYLE SWARTZ

Note: This excerpt is printed with permission from the Fall 2020 issue of StateWays—the Beverage Alcohol Merchandising Magazine for Control States.

Brown spirits continue to boom in America. Although consumer education remains a bit behind—many people still don't know the difference between bourbon and whiskey or Scotch and whisky—interest in distilled spirits remains very high.

This is obviously great news for distillers, distributors, and retailers alike. The depth of consumer interest has spurred numerous new brands to emerge from around the world in recent years. Product innovation also has reached new heights.

In this article, we look at seven trends that are defining the American market for whisk(e)y.

1) Younger Spirits Tasting Better

"Young" and "good tasting" rarely go together when describing whiskey. Particularly in today's craft boom when a number of cash-hungry, new-wave distilleries rushed product onto shelves with unmellowed whiskey that was still sharp and raw. That's hardly a way to build a brand: charging $65 and up for an off-flavored whiskey that needed more time in the barrel.

At the same time that these bad apples rushed out products, other distilleries put in the time to figure out how younger whiskey could taste better. The result has been a boom of bourbon under five years old that comes across the palate as being much older.

The craft movement has brought rising levels of distilling expertise, knowledge, and innovation. Add all that up, and suddenly the smarter distilleries can make younger whiskey that's worth bottling. Kaveh Zamanian, owner/founder of Rabbit Hole, says he never intended to release younger whiskey, but when tasting through early batches, he liked the results enough to bottle. Expertise and innovation came through in the end.

Another factor that's driving this trend is the continued popularity of high-rye mash bills like Bulleit, Four Roses, and MGP. Because rye achieves flavor faster—100 percent ryes can reach maturity in two to three years—this has allowed high-rye bourbons to mature faster as well.

2) The Next Evolution In Oak

As brands continue to innovate, look for more distillers to flex their creative muscles in employing oak.

Firestone & Robertson Distilling Co. recently began a program of aging in numerous kinds of oak: port, sherry, muscatel, cognac, tequila, rum, and more. Beyond releasing oak-specific expressions in the future, this also provides their blender with a bounty of flavor options to piece together the best blended products. In other words, unusual oak is no longer just for finishing.

"I think brands across the spirits category will start to experiment with more unique types of wood in the initial aging and not just in the finishing process," says Wes Henderson, cofounder and CIO of Angel's

Env.

On a simple level, it comes down to the whiskey category already being saturated with barrel finishes that have become too familiar for today's consumers. "Since so many varied types of finishes have been used in the industry, I think the next evolution we will see is more blends of finishes like our Four Wood (2011)," says Chris Morris, master distiller at Woodford Reserve.

3) Approachable Scotch Brands

Many younger consumers are hesitant to buy Scotch because the price point poses a significant barrier. Add in the diversity of Scotch, which can be confusing, and it's no wonder younger consumers reach for the likes of Bulleit Bourbon instead.

"We know that many fans of blended whiskies and bourbons shy away from single malt because they find the language intimidating and the variety in the category hard to navigate," says Brian Kinsman, master blender at William Grant & Sons. Last year the company released Aerstone, a new brand that has two expressions to give consumers a simpler choice. Sea Cask is smooth, while Land Cask is smoky. "We've also tried to lower the risk for people with [a lower] price," says Kinsman.

4) Age Statements Matter Less

We've been writing this for years: age statements have never mattered less to consumers. Quality comes first nowadays—trumping whatever number is on the bottle.

"When it comes to Scotch, the age statement is an indicator of quality and rarity, but it is not the only factor at play," says Rachel Barrie, whisky hall of famer and master blender at BenRiach, The GlenDronach, and Glenglassaugh. "Location (whether in a valley, on a hill, or by the sea), the geography, fermentation, distillation, and type of oak used all play a part in creating quality and flavor. Interestingly, non-age-statement whiskies allow a master blender to experiment more with the whisky stocks, and the outcome can be high-quality single-malt Scotch whisky with a distinctive expression of character."

Another factor behind age statements disappearing is the sheer lack of stock. As the brown spirits boom spreads worldwide, many brands do not possess enough aged product to satisfy consumer demand. Instead, companies have released innovative, high-quality blends that help put new bottles onto retail shelves. Consumers do not seem to mind one way or the other.

5) Store-Pick Single Barrels

Store-pick single barrels are a win-win. They grant retailers opportunity to pick their own barrels—often by visiting distilleries, where they can deepen bonds with the brand teams—before offering customers a product that is not available anywhere else.

6) Growth In Blends

Thanks in part to wine, "blended" is no longer a dirty word in the minds of consumers. It has evolved beyond the old meaning of "cheap." For the same reason that some brands show age statements while others do not, the surest way to appeal to consumers today is through quality. People do not care how old a whiskey is—or what it's made of—so long as it tastes great. It's another layer of innovation, producing new products and flavors for consumers to buy.

7) Terroir and Provenance

Another way some brands have chosen to stand out is showcasing local ingredients in their yeast, mash bills, oak selection, and more. Given the emphasis nowadays on localness in the broader craft market, we see this movement only expanding in whiskey in 2020 and beyond.

Some writers and other industry professionals have argued against whiskey terroir. Their counterpoint includes the belief that terroir is lost when the original grains go through such an extensive, dramatic manufacturing process as distilling.

Still, a growing number of whiskey-makers say it's possible to capture the unique flavor of a region in the bottle. "Our work with local farmers, maltsters, cooperages, and breweries allows us to celebrate every part of the Pacific Northwest culture and agriculture," says Chris Riesbeck, global commercial director for Westland Distillery, a leading producer behind the terroir movement. "We treat raw materials with the respect they have always deserved but rarely received. When you buy a bottle of Westland, you aren't just appreciating the work being done by our production team. You are engaging, supporting, and promoting an entire community built around the provenance of our region."

Highlight Innovative Brown Spirits for Sipping and Mixing

Take full advantage of the increasing interest in brown spirits by helping your customers explore the tantalizing, delicious taste of the latest innovative expressions of whisk(e)y, bourbon, and Scotch. Promote a variety of the newest offerings, including high-quality, smooth-tasting, flavorful "young" whiskies plus oak-aged, blended, flavored, single-malt, and store-picked single-barrel bottlings.

Take the time to find out the backstory of each offering, and share it with your customers. Encourage your customers to sip each of the beverages as is or over ice to fully enjoy every luscious drop before splashing them into soda water or cola, stirring them into iced tea or coffee, or using them to make extra-flavorful mixed drinks.

Basic Bloody Mary

Pinch of white or black pepper
1-2 pinches celery salt
½-1 teaspoon dried or fresh chopped dill
Celery stalk with leaves

Combine all of the ingredients except the celery stalk in a shaker half-filled with fresh ice. Shake gently, and pour (strain, if desired) the mixed drink into the prepared serving glass. Garnish with the celery.
